Semester Exam Goody Bags Available From Wabash Women

Wabash students are hard at work completing projects and writing papers, and final exams loom just weeks away. The Wabash Women organization is once again offering you an opportunity to let your son or your favorite Wabash friend know that you are thinking of him.

For $10.00 you can surprise a Little Giant with a Study Care Bag filled with goodies, along with your encouraging words of support as he prepares for final exams. The bags will be delivered to the living units on Sunday evening, December 11, 2005, and will then be distributed by the RA or members of the fraternity. Each Study Care Bag contains snack items such as chips, crackers, cookies, candy, a packaged drink, and other goodies, as well as your message (on the form below or in a note of your own).

Last May, Wabash Women donated $2,500 to a fund administered by the Dean of Students for Wabash students' personal needs and emergencies, $550 to the Even Start Family Literacy Program, and $550 to the Youth Service Bureau. With the monies from the Study Care Bag Project we hope to continue to help as we have in the past.

Please send (1) your check for $10.00 made payable to Wabash College; (2) the form below, with your message from home; and (3) mail check and completed form so that we receive it by

November 18, 2005 to:

Wabash Men Preparing for Hurricane Relief Trip

As many as 50 Wabash students will load on buses that will carry them to Moss Point, Mississippi Wednesday, where they will help clean up and rebuild after hurricane Katrina.

Wabash has about nine students from Mississippi and Louisiana, most of whom have gotten home at least once since the hurricane came ashore six weeks ago. Nikeland Cooper, a senior from Moss Point, has gotten in touch with his hometown mayor and the city is excited Wabash men are on their way. Wyman Plans to Bring Enthusiasm to Classroom

by Howard Hewitt

Aaron Wyman is a Visiting Assistant Professor of Chemistry who brings unbridled enthusiasm and energy to the classroom.

Wyman, who will at times refer to himself as introverted and other times as a circus clown, thinks his energy level is a valuable asset.

"For me teaching is all about energy and enthusiasm," the Alma College graduate said. "There are people who would probably argue that's not accurate, but for me it works. If I'm excited and giving everything I got, the students know that and typically they'll give me a little bit more as well. There's no greater thrill than that."

Wyman got his masters in biology at the University of North Carolina and his doctorate at the University of Michigan. But he was struck by what was available to him at Wabash College.

"I was immediately struck by this building (Hays Hall), the technology, and what was available at a really small college," the sports enthusiast said. "The equipment here is on par with anything I've been using in my graduate experience."

"The undergraduates here are phenomenal students and they're excited about being here. I love coming to work every morning. I look forward to the next day. I have the opportunity to not just teach classes but to create a course for spring semester."

Wyman plans on teaching a class in bio-chemistry he's designing now. He's looking forward to taking on a research assistant sometime soon as well.

"I had a wonderful mentor as an undergraduate. I really enjoyed that experience of working with her and learning what science is and how it's actually practiced, the history behind it and the idea, the thought process."

"I want to let students do science as undergrads so when they get to grad school they're sitting there saying I have learned all these things; I know the basics. So when they get there they can just go crazy and actually be two or three steps ahead of the next party."

Wyman grew up on a small Michigan farm but was heavily influenced by his mother and her siblings, who were all teachers. "I get no greater thrill than sitting down one-on-one or one on 500 and providing information, knowledge, and a thought process. I'm big on making students come to me – it doesn't do any good to just give them information; they must understand why two plus two equals four. When they make that connection it becomes permanent and makes all the other connections come so much faster."

He admits to being curious about his classes at an all-male school. "I did my interview lecture and I'm looking out at 25 guys," he recalled. "I thought, 'They're happy with this; I'm not a guy who says they should change.'"

He found irony in that experience because his first teaching experience at North Carolina was with a class of 24 women. "I thought that was the greatest place ever," he recalled with a chuckle.

Wyman and his wife live in West Lafayette. He is an avid reader and loves to participate in and watch sports. "I feel like I've found nirvana learning that 40 to 50 percent of the students here play a sport."

Campus Building Profile

BAXTER HALL is the home of the Social Sciences Division, where Wabash men study economics, history, political science and psychology. Made possible through gifts from the Baxter Foundation and other friends of Wabash, the building was constructed in 1964. Lovell Lecture Hall is a popular speaking venue for guest lecturers. Baxter Hall also is home to the Department of Computer Services.

Senior Bench

Among the student traditions at Wabash is the painting of the Senior Bench. The stone bench, which sits in front of Center Hall, has been painted by virtually every campus group. Fraternities scuffle over it as pledges paint and then protect it. The Bench serves as a canvas upon which students project their message. Recently, the Bench has also served as a memorial to lost friends.

A look at the history of this monument shows that the bench is a memorial to a family that gave a great deal to the early college. The Senior Bench is really the Thomson Bench. The Thomsons were a family dedicated to education and to the young Wabash College. James and John Steele Thomson were two of the founders “kneeling in the snow” in 1832. John Steele was the third member of the faculty behind Caleb Mills and Edmund O. Hovey. The Thomson family helped to build and then sustain the Wabash College and are worthy of remembrance.

The Bench almost immediately became the sole province of the Senior Class. Woe to the lowly who dared to sit on the sacred bench. The photo below shows members of the Class of 1916 enjoying the privileges of their recent elevation. Also shown are the inscriptions now lost beneath hundreds of layers of paint. The Senior Bench sits at the center of the campus and painting it is a key tradition for generations of Wabash Men.

Three seniors enjoy a leisurely read on the Thomson Bench, known to generations of Wabash men as the Senior Bench. The two men on the right are reading the November, 1916 issue of the Wabash Magazine.
